Dear Mr. [REDACTED]

Since you are the attorney for our family in handling the estate of my mother, Lou Anna Lawhorn, I feel I need to bring a situation to your attention, and to get your advice on how it should be properly handled.

I visited my brother, Freddie Joe in Greenfield, Tennessee over the Memorial Day weekend. He mentioned that all the money from Mom's bank accounts, which he had withdrawn as executor and put into an account at his local bank, had been disbursed. I knew from handling the bills and accounts earlier, and from what money I'd received, that approximately $15,000 should still remain. When I returned home, I rechecked my figures, then asked Fred if he'd missed clearing an account. He assured me that he had not. He stated that he split the money with me around last September, which certainly does not match my records or recollections. I asked for copies of his bank statements to check the activity on the account, but he has not supplied them.

The settlement of my mother's estate has now dragged on for one and a half years. Only a couple of very small properties and a little cash remain. I am quite concerned about recovering what is due me, since my brother claims to be near bankruptcy, although he "loaned" his first ex-wife $4000 recently.

Please write, or call me at [REDACTED] (Home) or [REDACTED] (Work) as soon as possible, and take any appropriate action you find necessary. Thank you for your assistance.

Sincerely yours,

Eddie T. Lawhorn
